The resemblance wasn't just superficial either. The first-generation Apple TV contained an internal hard drive — 40GB at first, with a later release offering a 160GB model for those who wanted more storage — and rather than streaming content from the cloud, it synced to a Mac or PC running iTunes much like the classic iPods of the day, with the only major distinction being that the Apple TV could do so over a network connection rather than a USB cable. Still, while it may seem primitive compared to its modern fully app-capable and cloud-connected descendant, the first-gen Apple TV entered a world where Netflix was still in the business of renting out DVDs by mail. While the planned transition of Macs to Apple Silicon may have stolen the spotlight, the upcoming macOS Big Sur release might be their biggest software update in years.
